SPACE JOURNALS

OUT OF THIS WORLD

Blast off with TVO for this five-day salute to space exploration coinciding with National Science and Technology Week. Since long before Neil Armstrong spoke the historic words, "One small step for man, one giant step for mankind," fascination with space travel has been astronomical. Each night at 8 P.M., hourlong documentaries will chronicle progress in space, from the 1957 launch of the Soviet satellite Sputnik to the preparations for the first manned flight to Mars.

Says Robert Ennis, producer and director of one of the documentaries, "One Moment in Time" (Oct. 22): "Using our unique style of storytelling, which combines a documentary approach with the dramatic flair of feature filmmaking, the series will chart a path to the launching and subsequent use of Space Station Freedom, a space-based laboratory currently being developed cooperatively by space agencies in Canada, the United States, Japan and Europe." Throughout the series, Canada's contributions to the global space success story will also be spotlighted. Of course, such efforts are currently at the forefront, with Canadian astronaut Steve MacLean taking part in the latest shuttle mission (scheduled for Oct. 15), in which one of the principal experiments is the Space Vision System, developed by Canada's National Research Council.
